In Brussels, there are more than one hundred organisations offering language courses. The choice of language and the level of learning are very diverse. Courses are offered by various organisations, including private language schools, municipalities, the Flemish and French-speaking Communities and the Chamber of Commerce (which runs courses open to non-degree seeking students in cooperation with the two Brussels universities VUB and ULB).

Free language learning

Most of the courses charge a tuition fee, but Brussels offers two routes to free language learning. The first requires being a resident in one of the city's 19 communes. For these residents, the Flemish government sponsors beginner Dutch courses (level 1 and 2) within its "Dutch as a Foreign Language"(or NT2) programme administered by Flemish Continuing and Basic Education Centres (CVOs). The second route is through Belgium's respective regional employment offices (Actiris, VDAB and Forem). All three offer a variety of language courses for free to registered job-seeker, such as Bruxelles Formation langues organized by Actiris. For those about to begin a new job, these offices allot up to 60 hours of language cheques-allowing its holder free private or group lessons-for those aiming to improve their skills in Dutch, French, English or German. Community-run continuing education schools are not for free, but not very expensive either.
